Essential Releases, September 10, 2021

Welcome to Essential Releases, our weekly roundup of the albums that we can't stop playing, and that we think you need to hear.

days on full display, Militarie Gun made a strong debut showing back in June with their All Roads Lead To The Gun EP. The sequel, out this week, rages just as hard, and gives equally few fucks, which is to say it's everything I want and expect from a noise rock album. If songs could be canonized, "Disposable Plastic Trash" would be the saint of purity, which is to say unpretentiousness: the tonal inconsistencies and occasionally shaky vocals are rough by pop-punk and post-hardcore standards, but also more human, more realistic, and ultimately, more satisfying.

Toronto's Motorists play a clean style of college rock; the sort where you can actually hear what the vocalist is singing, there's a bit of jangle but so much that you forget this shit came from post-punk, and a sense of bummed out disaffection and alienation pervading the whole thing. Of course, Motorists' cranky claustrophobia comes from the fucked up and circumscribed circumstances of the world in 2021 rather than being stuck in a subdivision all summer, but the band make it sound breezy all the same. Cool in spirit but never cold in delivery, these hooky and dynamic tunes are strong enough to be played straight without much ornamentation—just guitar, bass, and drums, please. Nothing new, but that's why we like it.
